Chewy. I just love painting dogs! What was nice about painting this dog was that I could use a very limited palette. White, black, ultramarine blue and burnt umber were used for the majority of the painting. I also used a small amount of yellow ochre and cad red in his eyes. How To Paint A Dog Portrait - Shelley Hanna Fine Art This is where the painting begins to really look like the dog reference. Using the reference for comparison, mix colors for each value section defined by your underpainting, and lay in the colors within the pre-mapped areas with a large brush. After the biggest areas are painted, layer on additional colors, but keep using the large brush. How to Paint a Portrait of a Dog: 14 Steps (with Pictures) Alternatively, mix the paint colors first;

then pour some of each color onto its own paper plate. Press a clean paw into the paint and then onto the project paper or canvas. Wipe paint off the paw with damp paper towels right away, wiping the fur off as well. If necessary, dip the paws in a small tray of water to help remove paint. Safe Paints to Use for Making a Dog Paw Print | eHow Begin layering individual strands of fur over the base color, gradually lightening the tones with each new layer. The idea is to end with the lightest highlight color on the top layer. It helps to imagine each layer of fur sitting on top of the one before it, like shingles on a house, each one overlapping the other slightly.
