Marxism And Human Nature Marx, however, does not refer to human nature as such, but to Gattungswesen, which is generally translated as 'species-being' or 'species-essence'. According to a note from Marx in the Manuscripts of 1844, the term is derived from Ludwig Feuerbach 's philosophy, in which it refers both to the nature of each human and of humanity as a whole. Marx's theory of human nature - Wikipedia Only the Marxist understanding of human nature has us as active participants, making ourselves through the interaction of our genes, our environment and our history. Marx's final thesis on Feuerbach is one of his most quoted lines: 'The philosophers have only interpreted the world, in various ways; the point is to change it.' Marxism and human nature - The Social Science Collective He finds that the passage need not be taken to deny the existence of a human nature. Geras then scours Marx's writings, offering us evidence of Marx's belief in a human nature, and (much more interestingly) what he thought that human nature was like, what our fundamental needs and drives were, and the relationship between nature and, as it were, nurture.
